Managing Conflict through Communication

Fifth Edition

DUDLEY D. CAHN
Professor Emeritus
State University of New York, New Paltz

RUTH ANNA ABIGAIL
Professor Emeritus
Azusa Pacific University

PEARSON

Boston Columbus Indianapolis New York San Francisco Upper Saddle River
Amsterdam Cape Town Dubai London Madrid Milan Munich Paris Montreal Toronto
Delhi Mexico City São Paulo Sydney Hong Kong Seoul Singapore Taipei Tokyo
CONTENTS

Preface ix

PART I Managing the Conflict Process

CHAPTER 1 Introduction to the Study of Conflict Communication 1

Objectives 1
Key Terms 1

What This Textbook Offers You 2

The Nature of Conflict 3
Defining Interpersonal Conflict 3
The Inevitability of Conflict 5

Conflict Management 7
Defining Conflict Management as a Skill 7
Linear and Transactional Approaches to Communication 8
Destructive and Productive Conflict Communication Processes 11
Negative View of Conflict 17
Learning to Respect Others: Civility as a Response to Conflict 20

Manage It 22
Exercises 24
Notes 27

CHAPTER 2 Communication Options in Conflict 29

Objectives 29
Key Terms 29

Intangible Conflict Issues 30
Conflict Communication Options 32

Dysfunctional Conflict Cycles 32
Avoiding/Accommodating Conflict Communication as an Option 33
Competitive Conflict Communication as an Option 37
Passive–Aggressive Communication as an Option 39

Functional Conflict Cycles 42
Compromising Conflict Communication as an Option 42
Collaborating Conflict Communication as an Option 42
Avoiding Early Compromising 43

Collaboration: The Preferred Approach 43
Low Personal and Relationship Stress 47
High Personal and Relationship Growth and Satisfaction 48

Communication Considerations: Choosing the Appropriate Communication Option 48
The Occasion (Including Time and Location) 48
The Other Person 49
Your Needs 49

Manage It 50
Exercises 51
Notes 53

CHAPTER 3 Managing Conflict from a Theoretical Perspective 55

Objectives 55
Key Terms 55
PART II  Breaking the Cycle of Escalation

CHAPTER 5  Managing Violent Tendencies  109
Objectives 109
Key Terms 109
Why Are People Violent? 110
Culture of Violence Theory 110
General Aggression Model 110
Interpersonal Violence Defined 111
Identifying the Potentially Violent Conflict Communicator 111
Verbal Abuse 112
Nonverbal Aggression (Physical Violence) 113
Gender Differences 113
Two Types of Interpersonal Violence 114
The Interpersonal Violence Cycle 114
The “Chilling Effect” Cycle 115
Communication Approaches to the Study of Interpersonal Violence 117
The Communicator Personality Trait Approach 117
The Communication Cognition Approach 118
The Communication Interaction Approach 121
Conflict May Be Inevitable but Violence Is Not 122
Dealing with Patriarchal Violence 123
Dealing with Parental Violence 123
Dealing with Alcohol and Jealousy 124
Dealing with Violence in the Workplace 126
Manage It 128
Exercises 129
Notes 131

CHAPTER 6  Managing the Conflict Climate  134
Objectives 134
Key Terms 134
Conflict Climate 135
Harmful Conflict Climate 135
Nurturing Conflict Climate 135
Converting Power Differences in Conflicts 136
Converting Competition to Cooperation 142
Converting Distrust to Trust and Avoiding Unhealthy Trust 143
Converting Defensiveness to Supportive Behavior 146
Overcoming Groupthink by Assertive Individual Responsibility 149

Manage It 152
Exercises 153
Notes 155

CHAPTER 7
Managing Face 157

Objectives 157
Key Terms 157
Understanding the Demands of Face 158
Two Types of Face: Positive and Autonomous Face 160
Face Management 162
Preventive Face Management 162
Supportive Face Management 164
Corrective Face Management 165
Repair Rituals 166
Reactions to Face Management 170
Conflict and Impression Management in Cyberspace 170

Manage It 172
Exercises 173
Notes 174

CHAPTER 8
Managing Stress and Anger 177

Objectives 177
Key Terms 177
Stress Management 178
Types of Stress: Eustress, Hypostress, HyperstRESS, and Distress 178
The Activities Approach 180
The ABC Model of Stress 181
Self-Talk 183
Developing a Playful Spirit 185
Changing How We Look at Life’s Challenges 186

Anger Management 187
Experiencing Anger 189
Anger as a Secondary Emotion 190
Three Common Ways People Manage Their Anger 191
Before Expressing Anger: Dos and Don’ts 194
While Interacting: Dos and Don’ts 195
Responding to Another’s Anger 195

Manage It 197
Exercises 198
Notes 201

CHAPTER 9
Managing Conflict through Forgiveness 203

Objectives 203
Key Terms 203
The Need for Forgiveness and Reconciliation 204
Relational Transgressions Defined 204
Defining Forgiveness and Reconciliation 206
Advantages of Forgiveness 207
Forgiveness Benefits Our Mental Health 207
Forgiveness Benefits Our Physical Health 208
So Why Don’t People Forgive? 208

Working Through Forgiveness and Reconciliation 209
Learning to Forgive 209
Levels of Forgiveness 210
Levels of Reconciliation 211
For Those Who Seek Forgiveness 212

Steps Toward Forgiveness and Possible Reconciliation 213
Step One: The Account and the Apology 214
DEALING WITH CONFLICT REMAINS CHALLENGING

As we coauthors worked on revising our textbook for the fifth time, we reflected on all that has gone on in our lives since we started collaborating so many years ago. A lot has happened to each of us over these many years. These significant events jolted us into reality and forced us to consider our subject from new perspectives resulting in the fifth edition of our textbook.

While much has changed for us in recent years, one principle has held steadfast throughout all editions of our book: Many people still have a strong need to study conflict. People tend to feel negatively about conflict, and they do not handle confrontations well. We believe that the common mismanagement of conflict explains the bad name given to the subject. We intend to help you learn more constructive attitudes and more positive conflict management and resolution skills, so that you feel less apprehensive about engaging in interpersonal conflict and better able to manage and resolve it.

Conflict continues to be one of the “grand challenges” of our time, occurring because of deep divisions in our society that carry over into our interpersonal relationships. There are cultural divides between ethnic, racial, and religious groups. There are political and value barriers that separate conservatives and liberals. There are gender gaps between the sexes. There are economic and power divides between upper and lower economic and social classes. There are age barriers between our younger and older citizens. When these divides carry over into interpersonal relations, even people of similar backgrounds find differences difficult to overcome.

Where there is a divide, we communication teachers and researchers look for bridges. It is no surprise then that we have identified communication as the essential bridge in overcoming conflicts. As a first step the conflicting parties must meet to deal with the issues that divide them. They must take time out of their busy schedules, allocate resources they may find limited, pay attention to matters they may consider unimportant or frustrating, and listen in order to learn how to bridge the gap that separates them. Meeting together and paying attention to the issues and each other is an important first step, but more is needed. In this next step, the conflicting parties must communicate. How do they do that? What do they say? How do they say it? Because they have thoroughly researched the communication processes in conflict situations, communication scholars have a great deal to offer students interested in studying conflict. They • offer a wide variety of tools for successfully managing conflict situations.

• are sensitive to ethical concerns as they create solutions to challenges such as conflict.
• view communication, conflict, the management of conflict, anger, stress, forgiveness, negotiation, and mediation as processes.
study the role of stress and negative attitudes as key contributors to conflict—anger as an escalator of conflict and emotional residues as barriers to reconciliation.

The purpose of this textbook is to apply these contributions to the effective management of conflict. While the challenge of conflict initially appears enormous, the subject is divisible into more manageable parts or learning modules. Moreover, as a discipline, communication has identified many principles and techniques that prevent conflicts from turning violent and damaging the conflicting parties and their relationship. Some of these principles and techniques are preventive in nature; others repair channels of communication and restore relations.

WHAT IS NEW IN THIS EDITION?

If we just consider all that has happened to us since our last edition, we are surprised at how much we wanted to change and add for this edition. Meanwhile, our students have caused us to realize that revising is necessary to better relate to them. They wanted more clarification, less redundancy, and longer treatment of some topics and less on others. They expressed their confusion to us and need for our help as they waded through the complex and challenging subject of interpersonal conflict. So what is different this time around? A lot!

- We have added a new chapter on interpersonal violence (titled Chapter 5: Managing Violent Tendencies), a topic that is receiving more attention in the study of communication and conflict.
- The theory chapter has been moved forward in the book and is now Chapter 3.
- The chapters on negotiation and mediation have been moved to Part III as Chapters 10 and 11.
- We combined the previously separate chapters on anger and stress into Chapter 8.
- Many chapters have been strengthened by adding theories and the findings of recent research studies that relate specifically to that topic.
- To make the text more useful to instructors who use classroom activities or teach in a discussion format, most chapters now include an exercise that captures the key idea of the chapter and a discussion assignment that applies the chapter's key ideas to a case study.

Our readership presents a challenge. While most college students continue to fall into the 18–22 single group who are interested in conflict issues related to dating, teachers, parents, and roommates, there are increasingly more “nontraditional” students taking college courses online and who reflect an older group, married or divorced, with children, and long-term employment, planning soon to retire, or presently serving our country in the military. They are more interested in issues related to their marriage, family, retirement, and military or workplace. We have tried to include issues and conflict examples that reflect the diversity of our students.

However, regardless of their age and marital status, we are struck by the fact that our students continue to come to us with little previous conflict training. Students of all ages would like to know exactly how to confront someone they know personally and how to better manage their present conflicts. They want to know specifically what to say and exactly how to say it. Introducing the S-TLC system for responding to conflict, six steps to successful confrontation, and how to create effectively worded I-statements in Part I of the text responds to the students’ need to learn immediately how to effectively deal with problems and issues they are presently facing.

As in the previous edition, Part I is intended to serve as an introduction to the study of conflict. Part II continues to emphasize the factors that escalate conflict and techniques for de-escalating it. However, we changed Part III to the idea of broadening the study of conflict to include negotiation, mediation, workplace conflict, and social conflict. Thus, the new edition addresses a wider variety of social contexts of interest to our students.

Throughout the textbook, we continue to provide practical advice concerning conflict along with theoretical notions about it. Each chapter is a learning module, beginning with specific objectives, followed by instruction including a summary clearly tied to the opening objectives, and finally ending with practical exercises that apply key ideas in the chapter to learners’ lives and case studies. Our thinking is that successfully doing the exercises is an indication that our students have mastered the content.

As you use this book, remember that conflict often results in personal change. Expect to question thoughts, feelings, and behaviors that you have taken for granted in the past and to add new ideas and actions to your ways of thinking and behaving.

LEE’S ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

Although I am officially Dudley Cahn, I am known to my students, colleagues, and friends by the nickname of Lee. As in previous editions, I have my students to thank for their help and input. This is probably due to the fact that I now teach this course entirely online, which is quite a different experience from teaching face to face. Students seem more open to express themselves online, revealing what they don’t know as much as what they do. From their comments, I am able to determine their needs and problems reading the text, doing the assignments, and discussing the key ideas. Because I found myself explaining more to my online students, I feel that there is a better way to organize the chapters and explain some of the key concepts and principles. Thanks to my students for their input and encouragement, the end result is a clearer work with a broader perspective than our earlier editions.

As I have done in earlier works, I would like to express my appreciation to the many scholars who have shared with me over the years their ideas on interpersonal conflict. Among them (in alphabetical order) are William Benoit, Nancy Burrell, Daniel Canary, Steve Duck, Sally Lloyd, Loreen Olson, Michael Roloff, Ray Ross, Teresa Sabourin, Stella Ting-Toomey, Steve Wilson, and Dolf Zillmann. Although my mentors have passed on, I want to acknowledge the important role they played in my life: Charles Brown, Donald Cushman, and Clare Danielsson. A day doesn’t go by that I don’t reflect on the influence these people had on me.

As a result of recently editing a scholarly book on family violence for SUNY Press, I learned a lot about conflict from my contributors. I would like to thank Nancy Brule, Jessica Eckstein, SuZanne Enck-Wanzer, Loreen N. Olson, Felicia Roberts, Angela Swanson, Mari Elenar Villar, and Steven R. Wilson for helping me better understand how interpersonal conflict can lead to violent behavior.

Obviously, I have my coauthor to thank for her willingness to again work with me. The first edition was her textbook alone, but I have been privileged to work with her starting with our second and subsequent editions. We alternate the role of senior author, so that each of us has an opportunity to take the work in a little different direction and run with it. I am pleased that Ruth Anna let me pilot the ship this time around, while she monitored and approved the changes I proposed. Although we alternate senior authorship, we continue to collaborate and take mutual responsibility for each revision.

I also have my spouse to thank for her patience, understanding, and willingness to put up with my mood swings and occasional fuzziness she could see in my eyes as I would swing from attention to inattention, which occurred as I reflected on what I had recently written or realized that I should have written instead. Sharon has strongly encouraged my writing efforts and allowed me a lot of time and the necessary space to accomplish this project as she did for the ones before. I appreciate the fact that, while we have learned how to collaborate as our marriage evolved, she did not see these revisions as issues for family conflicts.

Finally, I would like to acknowledge the role our adult children, Leanne Richards, Cort Happle, and Katherine Karpinski, have played in our lives and our four grandchildren, Jessica and Daria Richards, and Ethan and Kolby Karpinski.

RUTH ANNA’S ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

I want to first say thank you to Lee for his hard work on this edition. He really made it possible. It would not have happened if I were leading the task this time.

I’d also like to thank the many students who used this book in my classes and offered suggestions for revisions, as well as letting me use their stories to illustrate important points. I’d also like to thank Barbara Baker and Shelley Lane. We all met at USC in 1979 and it would be hard for me to estimate the impact both have had on my life. Thanks, my good friends!

Thank you to the members of the School of Adult and Professional Studies at Azusa Pacific University, and Fred Garlett (EJ), my dean, who have all been a great support to me in my scholarly endeavors. Thanks especially to the “hall people” who help me maintain sanity and perspective: Frank Berry, Brent Wood, Stephanie Fenwick, and Sarah Visser, and colleague Gordon Jorgenson, who loves to make me laugh. Special thanks also to the Circle of Friends: Julia Underwood, Trish Hanes, Leah Klingseis, Rebecca Knippelmeyer, Caron Rand, Gillian Symonds, Joyce Kirk-Moore, and Melanie Weaver, and to my friends David Esselstrom, Doug Campbell, Joseph Smith, and Murray Flagg—you all know why.

Finally, I thank my family for all they do to help me be the person I am: my adult children, Kathy and David Lulofs, my dogs, Elisa and Jacques, and my sister, Vicki McGuire.
Process of exchanging verbal and nonverbal messages in a conflict situation that starts with antecedents, moves through steps, and ends with consequences. Interpersonal violence occurs when a person imposes their will through physical intimidation Range from carefully planned attacks, to sudden emotional outbursts that injure others. Interpersonal violence cycle process goals. alternative means of managing conflict communication (privacy openness). cognitive disclaimer. additions to internal messages (should i be doing this?)